VI. 閱讀測驗（2%x3=6%）

Text messaging has become a popular way to communicate with friends, family, and coworkers. However, there are disappointing aspects associated with texting that can cause stress and anxiety. One of the negative elements of text messaging is that people now expect a quick response after sending someone a message. When people don't respond right away, an individual can feel anxious, frustrated, and upset.

One reason for these depressing experiences is that the senders of the messages may feel that they said something wrong or inappropriate, although they may not know what it was. Technology has made things worse in this respect because social media apps like Facebook, Line, and Snapchat can show you when a person reads your message. This, in turn, can create more stress.

There are several positive ways to deal with this anxiety, however. One method is to realize that people may have good reasons for not responding right away. For example, they might be busy with something urgent, or they could be afraid to read your message for one reason or another. If you are someone who is in the habit of not responding right away, you could let others know this. It's also important to remember that you should try to respond to messages fairly promptly to prevent others from feeling anxious.

All in all, texting is a great way to communicate, but it can also cause stress and anxiety. It's important to be aware of the problems connected with texting and find appropriate ways to deal with them. By doing so, we can make this activity a more positive experience for everyone involved.

57. Which of the following about text messaging is NOT discussed in the passage?

When it comes to space exploration, most people in the English-speaking world are familiar with the accomplishments of the US space agency, NASA. However, the contributions of the Soviet Space Program in the great race to space shouldn't be ignored. Both NASA and the Soviet Space Program formed in the 1950s in an effort to develop rocket propulsion technology.

While the US was working on the Apollo program to put astronauts on the moon, the USSR became the first to put a satellite into space with the Sputnik 1 in 1957. They were also the first to send a man, Yuri Gagarin, into space in 1961. Despite several disasters with the Soyuz spacecraft program, the Soviet Union was also the first country to develop an orbital habitat in space with the Mir space station.

The Mir station was made of seven sections, or modules, that were put together in low orbit by Soviet cosmonauts. The station, in use from 1985 to 2001, was in service longer than originally planned. Towards the end of the Cold War, Mir became a symbol of international cooperation and a bright spot for improved ties between the USA and the USSR. With the experience and knowledge gained by scientists and engineers on the Mir station, the International Space Station, or ISS, was established in the late 1990s. Even with its achievements now eclipsed by ISS, Mir still made invaluable contributions to the science of space travel.

After the USSR dissolved in 1991, the Soviet Space Program ceased to exist. Its successor was the Russian space agency Roscosmos, which took over managing the Mir station. By 2001, it had become too costly to maintain the Mir station, so it was guided back to Earth, where it crashed into a remote part of the Pacific Ocean called the spacecraft cemetery. When historians write the history of mankind's earliest steps into space, the Soviet Space Program and the Mir station deserve respect for the many milestones they achieved.

(F) Being the first to successfully launch a satellite into space.
